all widders, speshully managing ones as looks after the ale." That meek little man, the Rev. Arthur Simister, flushed with pleasure the pext morning when he received Mrs. Trevelyan's sutocratic missive. Alas, they had been friends in youth, but the Rev. Eliphalet Tervelyan had broken up their friendship by leading Miss Mildred Vanturg to the hymenealaltar. Miss Vanburg had imperiously bidden the Rev. Arthur to the wedding. "You may perhaps consider yourself badly dealt she had written to him, "but it has been pointed out to me that as vicaress of Brannerton I shall have a far more extended field of usefulness than if I were to share the life of a curate in the potteries. Some day, perhaps, we may meet again, when you have had a wider experience of men and manners."

And now, after the lapse of fifteen years, his old sweetheart was free to wed again. But fifteen years had somewhat modified the Rev. Arthur Simister's views regarding matrimony as well as his nonconformist women. And, though he still resented Miss Vanburg's desertion of him, no other woman and ever seemed to take her place in his without undergoing agonies of irresolution. But in the present instance he knew that if he did not determine to visit Mrs. Trevelvan would probably the blushed to the roots of his hair at the thought) insist upon coming to see him. What would his parishion ers say to such an imperious descent upon his modest, rose-embowered parsonage! He knew that they loved him too well to question his actions, but-!

At this juncture he found himself hastily making arrangements for next day's parish work with his faithful friend Miss Dorothy King. Miss King did not ask him any oues tions as to his destination, although she felt a vague uneasiness at the Rev. Arthur's contemplated departure. He was more irreso-lute than usual in his plans until she gently put him right. This middle-aged, placid countenanced, beautiful woman was his providence; he was accustomed to consult er about the most trivial subjects. could not consult her with reference to this would not care to hear about this wild. "You would be greatly missed," was Miss King's somewhat evasive reply. At this mosient there was an ominous shriek in the distance and the Rev. Arthur Simister had to run for his train.

"It's very annoying-very annoying, indeed," he said, as he galloped along the platform, a third-class ticket between his teeth and a Gladstone bag in his left hand. "I wish she had been more definite. I do hope (the guard bundled him into a carriage and slammed the door with a ferocity which sent shudders of apprehension down his spine) I do hope I shall be given strength of mind to act for the best." Late in the afternoon be arrived at Brau-nerton, feeling vaguely that he had been ill used. It made him very uncomfortable in-deed when a gorgeous footman with quivering calves plunged at his bag and scarcely verted his contempt for the inferior members of the clergy who traveled third-class, "It -it savors of estentation," he thought as he was put into the landau and the blood horses whirles him off in a cloud of dusa "I feel like a Roman emperor making a triumphal procession; that footman's calves have an air of unreality and stuffing about them," Miss King's little pony carriage was so much more comfortable than this circuslike vehicle. He felt as if he were going chariots. Besides, the mere thought of the cean made him seasick, in imagination, When Mrs, Trevelyan met him before dinner he was still more depressed. "I won't! I won't!" he hadnervously repeated to himself, while crumpling several white ties in succession before the looking-glass. Mildred was very harsh to me in the old days. I do not wish to see her again. She was firm then-very firm. Now she must be

The magnificence of the dinner still further depressed the Rev. Arthur; he finished cating while there were yet several courses to come. Mrs. Trevelyan drank wine-port wine-at desert, while he nervously toyed with some fruit. He disliked women whe drank port wine, who had red noses and boots. He was a meek, good-looking, dapper little man, who stood somewhat in a we of all He lingered in the dining from till pearly 8, although he knew that Mrs. by the 9 o'clock train. When he entered the drawing-room the gorgeous flunky who had condescended to carry his bag hesitating determination, whereas he could contemptuously brought him coffee, which never decide upon the most trivial subject be dared not refuse, although it always made him all at that time of night. He nervously drank it without any allaying sugar to temper its bitterness, and vainly hoped that the flunky would remain in the room-a hope which was speedily dissipated by that gorgeous being's denarture with an air which seemed to indicate that his better nature had been outraged by waiting upon so insignificant a little man as the Rev. Arthur. "And now, Arthur," said Mrs. Trevelyan, consulting a beavy gold watch, "now quarters of an hour in which to talk over

The Rev. Arthur vaguely rubbed his evening.

"I never allow meteoreological observations to interfere with the discussion of business," said Mrs. Trevelyan, "We have much to talk about. It is necessary for our future happiness (the Rev. Arthur winced) that I should fully explain myself- and I dislike interruptions." The Rev. Arthur bowed. It was as he feared His long-lost Mildred had evidentify resolved to return to him and render him unhappy for the rest of his days.
